

“Walls”

In the Education Center, we found a very interesting fact that there is a juxtaposition of two different approaches to education, and we managed to materialize their existence through two walls.

One wall, which is a book library, represents formal learning, referring to the compulsory education that requires students to learn languages, science, or say, knowledge that are abstract and beyond their tribe cultures.

The other wall, which is a tool and seed library, represents informal learning, referring to students' daily activities of planting and crafting. So we chose a type of local material, sisal, to design this side of the wall in the form of a web where tools and seeds can be hung on it and students can approach them by climbing up the webs. Besides, due to the fragile nature of sisal, the web will naturally fall in a period of time, and students are encouraged to work collaboratively and make their own webs.
